The most popular polo shirt is a unisex Interlock Polo, which costs $18 for a regular kids size, but you often find a promotion like Buy for three or more kids except $3 each or buy three or more adults, except $5 each. Customers rave about how fresh their polo shirts are straight out of the dryer, spots come out easily and durability got a high score. It's worth the price in itself. Ultra. F/Photodisc/Getty Images In some schools, it's important for students to wear school uniforms to maintain order between them. School uniforms are common in religious and private schools, and some public schools require them. Participation and academic success, according to a 2005 study, researchers found that an Ohio school that recently implemented a unified policy increased attendance as well as the total number of graduates in the 2005 school year. There have also been fewer suspensions in schools requiring students to wear uniforms or comply with strict dress code. The general belief is that because all students wear uniforms, there are fewer distractions in classrooms who are concerned about what they and others wear. School uniforms also help to boost morale and school spirit, as students wear school colors together. They seem more united, which in turn create a sense of community and cohesiveness while reducing the sense of competition. Efficiency and cost students who wear uniforms to school spend far less time preparing in the morning than students who don't wear uniforms. They don't have to spend time on what to wear or try on more than one outfit. This allows some students to get more sleep as they can wake up later in the morning knowing they don't have to spend as much time dressing up. They are also more likely to have time to eat a nutritious breakfast before school, giving them the energy they need to focus on their class. School uniforms can also reduce parents' clothing costs. Students who go to school without a uniform policy are more concerned about wearing stylish or expensive clothing. Parents of students with a single policy school, spend up to $150 less a year on clothing, clothing, the National Retail Federation. Bullying and violence school uniforms help to eliminate bullying due to the fact that everyone dressed the same and children can not be teased for wearing something unusual or different. Uniforms can create an environment of equality, since students from different economic backgrounds wear the same clothes, which can reduce bullying of those who can not afford elegant or expensive clothes. School uniforms allow for easy identification of school intruders, which is extremely important in the world of school shootings. Similarly, if a student is abducted or leaves school without permission, it is easier to identify them to the authorities if they wear school uniforms. Arguments against school uniforms Some argue that students should wear uniforms because it is contrary to their right to self-expression. They believe students should be able to express their personalities and creativity by dressing the way they want. Some parents feel that paying for uniforms is contrary to their right to send their child to a free public school. They feel that uniforms impose an additional cost that they would not have to be a felnesse to provide their child with free education. They argue that school uniforms actually create a greater target for bullying, as students from other schools can easily select students in uniform. Some pupils may also resent their school for wearing uniforms, which can cause behavioural problems that would not normally exist in schools where uniforms are optional. When you think of a dress code or a uniform, most people call for stereotypical images in the media: pressed and appropriate uniforms at military academies, navy blazers or sports coats with ties and pants in boys' schools, and plaid skirts and white shirts with knee-highs and shoes in girls' schools. But is this attire really the norm in private schools? Many private schools attribute most of their uniform traditions and dress codes back to Their British public school roots. The official starch collars and tails worn by the boys at Eton College are world famous, but nowadays they are hardly typical of a normal school uniform. Much more common is a looser dress code consisting of blazers, white shirts, school ties, pants, socks, and black shoes for boys; and the option of wearing clothes or a blazer and blouse pants or skirt, standard for girls. The word uniform refers to the raison d'etre, or the reason, unis as private school crowds call them. It is a peculiar and standard style dress that each student slides That everyone looks like a uniform. Some school uniforms allow optional additions, such as sweaters or vests to wear over uniforms. While the rules in each school will be different, and some will also allow students to add their own personal mood, dressing in the standard attire scarf and other accessories, there are typically restrictions on how much can be added to the uniform. Compared to the uniform, the dress code is an outline of acceptable attire, which is not limited to one or two options. It serves as more of a guideline rather than a rigid rule and provides more flexibility for students. Many see dress code as an attempt to create compliance, as opposed to uniformity. Dress codes vary from school to range from more formal dress codes requiring specific colors and limited choice of attire to more flexible options that simply prohibit certain forms of attire. Many schools have applied uniforms and dress codes for both practical and social reasons. Practically speaking, standardized uniforms allow the child to get there with a minimum amount of clothing. There is everyday wear followed by Sunday's best dress for several formal occasions. The uniform also often serves as a wonderful equalizer for social status. It doesn't matter if you're the Earl of Snowdon or the son of the local greengrocer when you put on that uniform. Everyone looks the same. Rules of uniformity. Sometimes, however, students have been known to overcome this balancing aspect with a variety of improvements, such as accessories and jewelry, that they have added to their uniforms. In the '90s, the Long Beach Unified School District introduced student dress codes. Proponents of the policy claimed that the dress code created an atmosphere of education, leading to better test scores and better discipline. Research varies, and students, parents and teachers often disagree on what is best. Parents and students often point out that uniforms restrict personal styles and expression. On the other hand, teachers often largely support uniforms and dress codes because of perceived improvements in both students' performance and behavior. The generally accepted opinion is that uniforms alone do not improve test results. These have an impact on the general discipline and participation of the school, which, along with many other aspects, leads to an improvement in students' education. That said, private schools tend to create an atmosphere for learning like public schools to begin with. Uniforms and dress code are just part of the formula for success. The real secret to success is the consistent enforcement of rules and regulations. Hold students accountable and you'll see the results. Most private schools also have codes for teachers. While the guidelines for adults do not reflect that students, often similar, attractive faculty members are modeling good behavior and best dress practices. Now, all of us That students of any age have their way around dress code requirements. The pants are a way to become a bit baggier than school regulation is intended. The shirts usually hang under the oversize jacket. Skirts seem to shrink overnight. This is difficult for schools to enforce, and violations can result in different responses, from verbal reminders to detention and even formal disciplinary action by repeat offenders. Offenders.
